PROBLEMS OR CHALLENGES:

- WHAT CHALLENGES ARE YOU ADDRESSING?
- The illegal wildlife trade is a growing criminal enterprise that leaves once flourishing forests barren, undermines governments and threatens human health. Millions of animals are victimized by traffickers each year, sold into the illegal pet trade, killed for meat/parts or kept alive in inhumane conditions. To combat this trade requires dedicated teams with the authority, skills and knowledge to enforce laws that protect wildlife, investigate and bust traders and safely handle rescued animals.

- WHERE ARE YOU ADDRESSING THE PROBLEM?

Barguna district are where fundamental needs wildlife are totally deprived off.

- HOW DOES THIS PROBLEM IMPACT THE COMMUNITY?

This area is deprived of recovery to provide of emergency preparedness for the wildlife needs. Wildlife are the worst sufferers as without proper support of recovery and emergency preparedness they fail to realize their full potential & unable to contribute community as well as to national development process. One approach for responding to the threats faced by forests and associated wildlife involves integrating the management of natural resources with economic development to improve the quality of life of rural people. Such integrated conservation and development projects have been given a variety designations for example people centered conservation and development, eco development, grassroots conservation and community based natural resources management. Community based conservation can be a significant complement to conventional government and enforcement activities especially in developing countries with limited budgets. When local people are involved in and benefits from the management of natural resources they are more likely to support conservation efforts. It is important to avoid certain assumptions. It should not be assumed for example that local people and their livelihood practices constitute the main threat to the biodiversity resources of a given area, since outside agents such as a bigger threat. New livelihood options may not actually reduce human pressures on biodiversity if they are seen by the community as additional opportunities rather than alternatives to exploiting biodiversity.

Although the challenges remain high and success depends on the contexts, the integration of conservation and development is standard practices today. For example are being designed with community wildlife management components. Some positive examples are described in other articles in this issue. increasingly communities are demanding the rights to manage their natural resources. Some governments are responding by making the necessary policy and legislative changes to help communities receive changes to help communities receive the benefits from such transfer of responsibility.

Solution : WRRT is a mobile unit established by Wildlife Alliance (WA) and the Bangladesh Government to fight wildlife crime nationwide. The team's military police, officials from the Forestry and the Fisheries Administrations, and WA managers work in concert with an informant network and utilize tips from the public to conducts undercover investigations into trafficking networks. WRRT intercepts wildlife shipments, builds solid court cases against offenders and rescues thousands of animals every year.

Potential long Term Impact:

The WRRT's ongoing presence and success are effectively suppressing the wildlife trade. By enforcing the rule of law, WRRT disrupts networks that traffic international contraband such as Bangladesh, ensures offenders are prosecuted, seizes goods, and saves animals. Long-term, this project both ensures that more wild animals remain in their native habitats by deterring people from poaching and trading and helps threatened wild populations rebound by releasing rescued animals. Bangladesh have a world largest forest like 'Sunderban'
